Studies linking pornography with violence 'are falling apart'

CALGARY (CP) — Studies that suggest violent pornography makes people aggressive are falling apart under close scrutiny, and courts may handle pornography cases differently as a result, says a University of Calgary professor.

Even researchers who conducted the studies are rejecting their findings, says Augustine Brannigan. Lawyers will be hard-pressed for proof if they argue that exposure to pornography leads to hostile behavior and even rape, he says.

Brannigan and Sheldon Goldenberg, both University of Calgary associate professors in sociology, organized seminars on pornography research in Montreal this month as part of a conference on law and mental health.

Pornography researchers at the seminars — attended by up to 50 at one time — were virtually unanimous in rejecting the studies, says Brannigan.

"We didn't realize that there were so many misgivings in the field."

The credibility of the pornography studies, most of them from the late 1970s or early 1980s, is in doubt largely because attempts to duplicate their results have failed, the researchers were told.
